A New Week, And I Need to Make a List

1. Sometime in the next day or so I should bring a bunch of used and un-needed tarps to East Campus. I'm told that EC collects tarps. For what, I'm not sure.
2. From the "Mom! He's looking at me!" files: One of my coworkers likes to do things that make people uncomfortable. Yesterday he insisted on making eye contact with me.
3. I really need to follow-up with a research contact I made last week.
4. My real job sends me all these pesky emails. I am in total denial of the following:
 - o I have to learn the new online homework system.
 - o I am teaching an overload and know nothing yet about the topic of one of the courses.
 - o I'm taking a programming course that I'm moderately unprepared for.

My Parallel Universe Social Scene

For reasons I can't entirely place, I have way more friends in Cambridge, MA than I do anywhere else. While, yes, it makes sense that I should know a bunch of people here, there's no good reason why they should so substantially outnumber the people in, for example, the place where I've lived for the past five years. I think that's one of the reasons that I like working here: an

Plurk? Interesting

Posted on July 6th, 2008 in blogging with 2 comments

I've played around a bit with Plurk, since Joe Brennan invited me to join — knowing now that my acceptance has beefed up his Karma. I'm not even going to try to explain.

It's an interesting application, or platform for communication. It's like Twitter, but probably more like blogging than Twitter is. The difference between Twitter and Plurk, that I've observed so far, is that a single Plurk message, can be commented on, turning itself into a conversation — just like commenting on a blog. It's micro-blogging in that you're limited to 140 characters, just like Twitter. But it is blogging, because it facilitates conversation more effectively.
